as many different types as there are squadrons of machines. Deperdussin, Morane-Saulnier, Nieuport monoplanes and Viosin and Farman biplanes are all used. The French, however, lead in what may be called fighting aeroplanes, distinguished from those only useful for scouting. Most of their latest machines are lightly armored about the fuselage and the engines, and mount either a machine gun or, in the case of the big biplanes, a 37-mm. Hotchkiss rapid fire gun. A squadron of these machines would be no mean antagonist for a Zeppelin, as they would be superior in speed and would offer far smaller targets for the Zeppelin's guns. An old feature of the European war fleets is that the most efficient aeroplanes are mounted among them are American inventions, the Hotchkiss, the Sims and the Lewis being among these.

The only criterion to the relative efficiency of the crews piloting these aeroplanes lies in the fact that German aviators now hold the world's distance, altitude and duration records. The French have achieved the most remarkable results in mobilizing and maneuvering in squadrons.
